Movement of Grace: Religious Life and the Evolution of Christ Consciousness

Gail Weseło, SGM

“Nothing changes. We are not moving at all.” ()

We are moving. We are going somewhere. I kept coming back to this fundamental insight that has been dawning on our awareness over the past 200 years as we came to understand ourselves as part of a vast unfolding process. This slow, yet undeniable revolution affords not only how we see the cosmos but how we understand ourselves and religious life in the 21st century.

My mentor, the late Passionist priest and cultural historian, Thomas Berry, pointed out that not only are we moving but moving towards deeper expressions of appearances, perceived that the forces of nature are moving unerringly from their origins to the stars themselves, but their own movement is expressively directed towards the stars. The stars are moving from their own direction towards the earth. This is the movement of grace, the movement of the stars, the movement of the cosmos.

The conflict arises from the day when we are aware of the true movement of the stars and our own movement in the cosmos. The conflict arises from the day when we recognize the true movement of the stars and our own movement in the cosmos. The conflict arises from the day when we recognize the true movement of the stars and our own movement in the cosmos.
